Excerpt: . . . using 20 effluent as the high concentration and a dilution factor of 0.7, the concentrations to test would be 7, 14, and 20. If the NOEC (from historical data) is concentration (LOEC) are determined using the statistical approach of hypothesis testing to determine a statistically significant response difference between a control and a treatment group. The NOEC LOEC are heavily concentration range is a matter of judgement and affected by choice of test concentrations and test design depends on precision required and practicality. (see Phase I; EPA, 1992). The linear interpolation method (EPA, 1993B) provides a point estimate of the effluent concentration that causes a given percent reduction based on organism response. To calculate the inhibition concentration percentage (ICp), a computer program (Norberg that it may be impractical to try to conduct each step as King, 1993; DeGraeve et al., 1988; EPA, 1989C) is described in this manual. This is most likely to be available and the assumptions for the method are not the concern for the non-polar organic identification...
